

Dominic Lesnar was first drawn to the night sky as an adolescent, growing up in the deserts (and intense light pollution) of Las Vegas, NV. More than forty years later, he remains captivated by an evening under the stars.

While he has no formal credentials that qualify him to speak about the moon missions (evidently a B.A. in French doesn't count), he's been an Apollo enthusiast since boyhood, and he's drunk plenty of Tang through the years.

When not gazing upward, he enjoys reading Calvin and Hobbes (the comic strip by Bill Watterson, not the philosophers), Essais by Michel de Montaigne (the philosopher this time) or playing J.S. Bach at the piano.

A resident of WNC since 1991, he has served as president of the Astronomy Club of Asheville since 2015.
